A learning encounter

Simran and her mother were descending to the ground floor from their 10th floor flat when without warning, the lift stopped halfway and the door would not open. It was a terrifying moment for both of them — something they had never experienced before. Fortunately, the light in the lift was on or it would have been more frightening for them.

Simran's mother had heard of people getting trapped in lifts for hours when the electricity failed, but those incidents had happened when the electricity system was less efficient and lifts were not as foolproof. Besides, the light in the lift was still on, which showed that it was not an electrical fault that had caused the lift to stop.

Several minutes passed, but nothing happened. Simran began to cry, but her mother said, "Don't worry, Simran. Something will be done to get the lift working again, I can hear people talking outside. I'm sure they have sent for a technician."

After some more minutes, all of a sudden, the lift started descending again. When they reached the ground floor, the door opened, and as they emerged from the lift, they saw a number of people standing around and talking. Among them was a boy with a screw driver in his hand, grinning at them. One of the bystanders said that the boy, Raju, had got the lift working again and he had done so once before too.

When the technician arrived, he was surprised that the lift was in working order. But when he heard that a boy had done something to get it working again, he was very angry. He said that it could be quite dangerous for an untrained person to meddle with the working of a lift.
